

Excerpt from Egypt and Iceland: In the Year 1874 Alexandria, Egypt, March 14, 1874. When we passed Crete, two days ago, the north wind - the very same Euroclydon which once so interfered with the voyage of St. Paul - grew finally tired of blowing, and a light breeze, with the promise of summer on its wings, stole over the waters from the unseen Libyan shore. The gales which have convulsed the Mediterranean this winter left only a long, uneasy swell behind them, and we were even glad to escape the sight of land, coupled as it was in Sicily and Calabria and Crete with that of abundant snow. Winter is never so wearisome as when one is trying to escape it. I saw Egypt for the last time in 1852, when steamers were just beginning to ply upon the Nile, and a line of very rude omnibuses crossed the desert from Cairo to Suez about once a month.
